Programme, procedures and working methods of the Commission and its documentation (agenda item 11)

The Chairman, drawing attention to the revised programme of work for the third week of the second half of the session, which had been distributed to Commission members, said that Mr. Gómez-Robledo, the Special Rapporteur on the provisional application of treaties, would introduce his fourth report on the topic on the morning of Wednesday, 20 July 2016. The report would be issued in all six official languages of the United Nations during the course of that day. In the meantime, advance versions of the report in English, French and Spanish had been circulated. He wished to emphasize that commencing a debate on a topic on the basis of advance versions of a report in only some of the official languages was an exceptional procedure, and he was grateful to Commission members for their flexibility in being prepared to proceed on that basis.

Mr. Gómez-Robledo said that he, too, wished to thank members of the Commission for adapting to the difficult circumstances, of which he hoped there would be no repeat during the next quinquennium. To that end, it was important that the Planning Group saw to it that a very strong message should reach the General Assembly recommending that measures should be taken to enable the Commission to continue fulfilling its mandate in the future. The current page limits on documents had led to undue pressure being put on the secretariat.

Mr. Hmoud, noting that some language versions of the Special Rapporteur’s fifth report on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction would not be ready until early August 2016, said that consideration by the Commission of reports that had not yet been translated into all the official languages should be regarded as exceptional and should not create a precedent. The Commission should request the secretariat to draft a document for consideration at its sixty-ninth session explaining the failure to issue certain language versions of documents in a timely fashion.

Mr. Kittichaisaree said that the six official languages of the United Nations should be treated equally. It was important for Special Rapporteurs to adhere strictly to the deadlines that the secretariat had set for the submission of documents so as to allow sufficient time for translation. He was concerned that the late issuance of certain language versions placed unfair burdens on the Special Rapporteurs concerned and members of Commission, who at times were forced to use valuable meeting time double-checking translations that had been done in haste.

Mr. Forteau said that he wished to endorse what had been said regarding the need for accurate, timely translations of documents and regarding the problems the Commission had experienced in that connection over the years. That said, it should be acknowledged that the Commission perhaps bore some responsibility for the situation. It had included nine topics on its agenda for the current session and had not always followed its own 2011 recommendation that the reports of Special Rapporteurs should not exceed 50 pages. The Commission might therefore have somewhat overburdened the translation services. He agreed that the Planning Group should address the matter.

Mr. Murphy said that the Commission found itself in a very exceptional situation and that it was not satisfactory for translations to be made available on the first day of the debate on a topic. Commission members needed time not only to read reports but also to analyse sources and conduct research. However, before sending any messages, the Commission should look into whether Special Rapporteurs were meeting the deadlines that had been set for the submission of reports.
The Chairman said that, time permitting, it would be helpful to schedule a private meeting to discuss deadlines, page limits and other matters pertaining to the submission and consideration of reports. He took it that the Commission wished to adopt the revised programme of work as proposed by the Bureau.

It was so decided.

_Jus cogens_ (agenda item 10) (continued) (A/CN.4/693)

The Chairman invited the Commission to pursue its consideration of the first report of the Special Rapporteur on _jus cogens_ (A/CN.4/693).

Mr. Niehaus said that he wished to thank the Special Rapporteur for his valuable report on a topic that had, for a long time, required further study. The importance that States attached to the subject of _jus cogens_ and their interest in it were clear from their widespread approval of the Commission’s decision to address the topic and the statements that they had made before the Sixth Committee.

Regarding the relationship between the natural law and positivist schools, he agreed with the Special Rapporteur’s assertion in paragraph 42 of the report that the work of the Commission should be based on a sound and practical understanding of the nature of _jus cogens_, which necessitated a study of some of the theoretical bases that had been advanced. While the Special Rapporteur ably avoided trying to provide a solution to the theoretical debate, he did not deny its importance. Personally, he agreed with the view cited in paragraph 59 of the report that _jus cogens_ was best understood as an interaction between natural law and positivism.

In paragraph 61 _et seq._ of the report, the Special Rapporteur correctly stated that article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties contained the basic elements of _jus cogens_ norms, which were norms of general international law that were recognized by the international community and from which no derogation was permitted. In addition, practice and writings revealed that such norms were universally applicable, were superior to other norms of international law and protected the fundamental values of the international community. He had reservations about the notion of regional _jus cogens_, which in his view was not only inappropriate but even potentially dangerous, in that it could lead to thoughts of subregional, multinational or bilateral _jus cogens_, something which was contrary to the essence of _jus cogens_.

Given that the fundamental values of the international community were not static and could evolve over time, it was essential to stress that _jus cogens_ had the potential to transform the legal order as a whole and, by extension, international society. It was, for example, possible that _jus cogens_ norms could emerge, in the not-too-distant future, in relatively new fields such as environmental protection. The transformative potential of _jus cogens_ therefore warranted further, detailed study.

Although the proposal to provide an illustrative list of _jus cogens_ norms had met with some criticism and opposition, such a list would be highly desirable as it would help shed light on the characteristics of _jus cogens_. Although such a list did not yet exist, it was possible, on the basis of the elements identified above, to have a fairly clear idea of what it would include. For example, there was no doubt that the prohibition of genocide, torture, racism and apartheid, the right to self-determination and fundamental norms of humanitarian law were part of what should be understood by “_jus cogens_”.

He agreed with the Special Rapporteur that draft conclusions were the most appropriate format for presenting the Commission’s work. The conclusions should reflect current law and practice concerning _jus cogens_; unnecessary theoretical debates should be left aside.
Turning to the draft conclusions, he said that, in the Spanish version at least, draft conclusion 1 was confusing and more of a statement of intent than a conclusion. It should therefore be redrafted, as necessary. The text of draft conclusion 2 (1) was acceptable. In draft conclusion 2 (2), he would prefer the opening phrase to refer to “an exception to the provision contained in the previous paragraph” rather than to an “exception to the rule set forth in paragraph 1”. However, he would leave the matter in the hands of the Drafting Committee. He had no objection to draft conclusion 3, which was very clear, appropriate and undoubtedly the most important of the three proposed draft conclusions. In view of its importance and for reasons of logic, he proposed reversing the order of draft conclusions 2 and 3. Provided that his proposed changes were taken into account, he supported the referral of the three draft conclusions to the Drafting Committee.

Mr. Nolte (First Vice-Chairman) took the Chair.

Mr. Comissário Afonso said that the report was a model piece of scholarship and research and presented a succinct discussion of the many complex issues involved. The statements made by Member States in the Sixth Committee had shown the importance that they attached to the matter. As it was the first time since the adoption of the Vienna Convention in 1969 that the Commission had addressed the subject in depth, care must be taken to ensure that the result could not be interpreted as deviating from that text. In the analysis of the theoretical basis presented in the report, both the tension between natural law and positivist theories and the conclusion drawn in that respect were of particular interest. As other members of the Commission had said, the two approaches were not contradictory and could both be used to explain the concept of jus cogens.

He agreed with the Special Rapporteur that the Commission should not depart from its traditional method of work, based on State practice, jurisprudence and writings; the particular weight to be accorded to each in the final output would necessarily vary. Although the Commission was divided on the question of the preparation of an illustrative list of jus cogens norms, such a list was important and necessary because substance needed to be given to the concept of jus cogens, which enjoyed quasi-universal acceptance and was no longer seriously challenged. Since the signing of the Vienna Convention, the legal structure of the international community had changed enormously and had developed in ways that called for certainty and security in the present international legal order. A global society needed global norms. It would be hard for Member States to understand that the Commission could have engaged in progressive development of jus cogens based solely on its definition and other theoretical matters, without mentioning and listing norms with the status of jus cogens. As the Special Rapporteur stated in paragraph 73 of the report, the essential character of the work on the topic should be to clarify the state of the law based on current practice.

The implications of the notion of the universal applicability of jus cogens norms set out in paragraph 68 of the report, namely that the doctrine of the persistent objector was not applicable to jus cogens and that jus cogens norms did not apply on a regional or bilateral basis, perhaps resulted from too close a parallel being drawn between customary international law and jus cogens. It was a matter that deserved further consideration in future reports. A careful reading of article 53 of the Vienna Convention and article 38 (1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice showed that those articles had only two words in common, namely “accepted” and “recognized”. While the scope of the Statute was clearly limited to a certain category of States, article 53 of the Convention stated that a peremptory norm of general international law was a norm accepted and recognized by the international community of States as a whole. To extract from that text the notion of a regional jus cogens would require an enormous academic exercise, which might erode rather than reinforce the Vienna regime and, ultimately, lead to legal relativism and further fragmentation of international law. Peremptory norms of a regional character were quite acceptable and might well exist, but they did not, on that basis, qualify as jus cogens norms; the latter had, among other things, to be accepted and recognized by the international community as a whole. In order to be so accepted and recognized, the value requiring protection must be not only of a universal character, but also a matter of fundamental human concern. The same reasoning held true, mutatis mutandis, with respect to the question of the persistent objector, which, in his opinion, had no place in jus cogens.

Regarding the final product, he agreed with the Special Rapporteur that draft conclusions were the most appropriate outcome for the Commission’s work on the topic. The three draft conclusions proposed in the report, although not uncontroversial, should all be sent to the Drafting Committee, in the light of the comments that followed. Draft conclusion 1 was acceptable in terms of its content; as to its form, the Commission should follow the approach adopted for the topic of protection of the environment in relation to armed conflicts. If it was considered that the provision did not deal with the scope of the topic as such, it would need to be renamed. Draft conclusion 2 was unnecessary; the distinction it sought to draw between jus cogens and jus dispositivum could be made in the commentary. He agreed with the comments made by Mr. McRae in respect of draft conclusion 2. He endorsed draft conclusion 3, which was of crucial importance. However, with regard to paragraph 1 thereof, the Commission should be cautious in its approach and not depart from article 53 of the Vienna Convention; if necessary, paragraph 1 should reproduce the text of article 53, with minor adaptations. He supported the main thrust of paragraph 2, which was well founded; in fact, it should stand as a separate draft conclusion.

Mr. Kamto said that he wished to commend the Special Rapporteur on his remarkable first report, in particular section IV thereof, which presented an overview of the historical evolution of the concept of jus cogens and formed a good starting point for discussion of the subject.

In contrast to most of the other subjects dealt with by the Commission, the topic of jus cogens was purely conceptual; consequently, the theoretical questions that it raised could not be ignored or dealt with in a cursory manner. It was only on the basis of a clear understanding of how a legal norm came to be considered as jus cogens that the nature of the latter could be discussed. Despite what might have been stated in the literature, jus cogens was not and could not be a technical norm. Rather, it was a value norm that was enshrined in law; it was not necessarily a moral norm and the sphere of values to which it belonged was of little importance. That was the meta-juridical source of the jus cogens norm, not the instrumentum of the rule, and it was to that question that the discussion concerning the nature of jus cogens sought to find an answer. The instrumentum could be either a treaty or custom, while the meta-juridical source could be religious, philosophical, deduced from natural logic or reason, or linked to the emergence of an international public order.

The Special Rapporteur was thus no doubt right to consider the two main legal theories of natural law and legal positivism. It was not a matter of re-examining those theories or their component parts, but rather of taking them as a starting point to explain the basis of legal normativity, either to try to identify the origin of jus cogens, or to draw out its characteristic features as compared to other, “ordinary”, rules of law. On that point, there was a certain lack of clarity regarding the Special Rapporteur’s understanding of the concept of “nature”, inasmuch as he referred, in paragraph 42 of the report, to the concept of the “foundations” of jus cogens, while, in paragraph 43, he spoke of its “role” beyond the Vienna Convention. Technically, article 53 of the Vienna Convention should certainly form the starting point of the study; however, although that article explained how a norm of general international law became a peremptory norm, it did not explain why such a norm came to have the particular characteristic of rendering void any treaty that conflicted with it. If that question were not addressed, the emergence of jus cogens would be limited to cases in which such a norm was provided for in a treaty, where it was a clear expression of the will of the States concerned. However, that would not explain why a customary norm should become _jus cogens_.

To establish why only some rules of customary international law or general international law became _jus cogens_, a distinction had to be made between those _jus cogens_ rules that arose from treaties and those that emerged from customary international law or general international law. In the former case, a norm became a _jus cogens_ norm when it was designated as such by a treaty to which the community of States as a whole was party. However, a treaty norm that was not designated as _jus cogens_ in the treaty concerned could be declared as such on a customary basis by an international court in a dispute submitted to it, as had happened with the rule on the prohibition of torture through the judgment of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in the _Furundžija_ case, referred to in paragraph 55 of the report.

A norm of customary law origin could become _jus cogens_ on the basis of article 66 of the Vienna Convention, which allowed the International Court of Justice to decide on the peremptory nature of a norm. However, it could also be argued that a norm of customary international law or general international law was peremptory because it expressed a fundamental value of the international community of States.

In his view, the two ideas should be combined. If, as some members had said, non-treaty _jus cogens_ should be determined on the basis of practice, it would not be clear why a practice should become a legal rule or, _a fortiori_, _jus cogens_. Even if _opinio juris_ were added to the requirement of practice, it would still identify only a customary rule, not a _jus cogens_ rule. In the context of the present topic, reference should be made to practice accompanied by _opinio juris_ of a peremptory nature, which could perhaps be called _opinio juris cogens_.

In respect of the second theoretical issue, the idea of the superiority of _jus cogens_ over other norms of international law, mentioned in paragraph 63 et seq. of the report, he agreed with other members that no convincing basis had been provided for such a hierarchy of norms. Such hierarchy was essentially based on the distinction between _jus cogens_ and _jus dispositivum_. However, in the classical theory of international law, that distinction was grounded in the origin of norms, not their legal force or scope. He agreed with the statement in paragraph 66 of the report that States could not escape from _jus cogens_ by agreement. However, according to article 53 of the Vienna Convention, a norm of _jus cogens_ could be modified by a new norm of _jus cogens_. If the superiority of _jus cogens_ were recognized, it would be tantamount to saying, for example, that it always prevailed over any non-_jus cogens_ rule, including in procedural matters. However, such an idea could not be argued in the light of the judgment of the International Court of Justice of 3 February 2006 in _Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda)_ in which the Court had stated that “the Court deems it necessary to recall that the mere fact that rights and obligations _erga omnes_ or peremptory norms of general international law (_jus cogens_) are at issue in a dispute cannot in itself constitute an exception to the principle that its jurisdiction always depends on the consent of the parties”.

A third theoretical question linked to _jus cogens_ as a customary law rule was that of the persistent objector. To accept the idea of persistent objection as a way of evading the application of _jus cogens_ would amount to departing from the provisions of article 53 of the Vienna Convention, which stated that a peremptory norm of general international law was a norm from which no derogation was permitted and which could be modified only by a subsequent norm of general international law having the same character.

The provisions of article 53 of the Vienna Convention also argued against the fourth theoretical question raised, that of the possibility of regional _jus cogens_. The States of a given region could use whatever term they wished to describe the rules they established to impose obligations on one another, without those rules being on the same level as jus cogens in the sense of article 53. Most erga omnes obligations established at the regional level could indeed be regarded as jus cogens by and for the States concerned; however, like any other non-peremptory rule, they would be rendered void if they conflicted with a peremptory norm of general international law and they could not be applied to third party States outside of the region concerned.

As to methodological issues, the Special Rapporteur should have begun his study of the topic by clarifying its key terms. Thus, he should have defined the concept of jus cogens in relation to erga omnes obligations, on the one hand, and intransgressible norms and non-derogable norms, on the other. Jus cogens norms were erga omnes, as the International Court of Justice understood that expression in its jurisprudence. However, not all erga omnes rules were automatically jus cogens. It should be explored whether jus cogens, intransgressible norms and non-derogable norms were synonyms and, if so, why different terms were used for the same concept.

Institutional or jurisdictional mediation was central to explaining the emergence of non-treaty jus cogens, as it was the nexus between the meta-juridical basis of jus cogens and the mechanism provided for in article 66 of the Vienna Convention. It was clear from that article that, apart from cases in which jus cogens status was conferred by treaty, it was, in practice generally for the International Court of Justice to rule whether or not an alleged peremptory norm was indeed jus cogens. The provisions of article 66 clearly translated the awareness of the authors of the Convention that it would be difficult for States to agree on the application or interpretation of a norm alleged to be peremptory. The Court would thus serve as mediator, as it did in respect of determining customary international law. That was, at least for the moment, the best way of determining jus cogens. In fact, he was not aware of any treaty-based jus cogens, as the examples generally cited came from case law.

As to whether to compile a list of jus cogens norms or to refer to examples in the commentaries, he had no particular preference. First, such a list could never be exhaustive and so it would be no different from simply providing examples. Secondly, although the Commission was required to identify the guiding principles or method for determining jus cogens, it should not itself seek to identify the norms concerned. Although it had done so in the past — as had been recalled by the International Court of Justice in its judgment of 27 June 1986 in the case concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) — that had been before the adoption of the Vienna Convention. He was of the opinion that article 66 of the Convention, together with article 53 thereof, indicated that the determination of such norms was a matter for States within the framework of a treaty and that, outside that framework, in the context of a dispute between States, it was a matter for the International Court of Justice. It would not be advisable for the Commission to take such a step and risk disavowal by the Court.

Turning to the draft conclusions, he said that, if all three draft conclusions were to be retained, the order of draft conclusions 2 and 3 should be reversed. However, in his view, not all the draft conclusions should be submitted to the Drafting Committee.

Draft conclusion 1 was couched in peremptory terms that were unsupported by the content of the report and ill-suited to the very notion of a “conclusion”. It would be advisable to replace the phrase “The present draft conclusions concern the way in which jus cogens rules are to be identified” with “The present draft conclusions concern the manner of identifying jus cogens rules …” [Le présent projet de conclusions concerne la manière d’identifier les règles du jus cogens …] because the purpose of the draft conclusions was simply to identify the manner of proceeding, not to lay down a legal obligation in that respect.
Draft conclusion 2, especially its first paragraph, seemed complicated, obscure and irrelevant, because, in effect, it amounted to saying that jus cogens could be modified, derogated from or abrogated, unless otherwise provided by jus dispositivum. He wondered what was so special about jus cogens in that connection; the same could be said of jus dispositivum itself. Since the first paragraph was irrelevant, the second paragraph setting forth a non-existent rule was otiose, as the initial rule to which it was deemed to make an exception was incorrect.

Draft conclusion 3 (1) could be improved by repeating the exact wording of article 53 of the Vienna Convention and should be entitled “Character of jus cogens norms”. The second paragraph of that draft conclusion deserved a more thorough examination and should be turned into a separate draft conclusion. While he did not rule out the Special Rapporteur’s idea that jus cogens norms protected the fundamental values of the international community, that idea must be substantiated theoretically and practically with examples drawn from State practice and case law. The Special Rapporteur had not provided sufficient evidence in his first report.

He was in favour of referring draft conclusions 1 and 2 (1) to the Drafting Committee, but not draft conclusions 2 (2) and 3 (2).

As far as future work on the topic was concerned, it would be inadvisable to assess the draft conclusions already adopted with a view to enhancing their overall coherence, because that would introduce an element of uncertainty into the outcome of that work which, albeit provisional, would already be in the public domain. Secondly, the Special Rapporteur should make clear that, in his third report, he would deal with the consequences of jus cogens in relation to State responsibility. It would be illogical to broach that aspect of the topic before defining the notion of consequences and examining the legal rules pertaining to it.

Lastly, he concurred with a number of other members of the Commission that, since jus cogens also existed in municipal law, it would be wise to make the title of the topic more precise and to change it to “international jus cogens” or “jus cogens in the international legal order”.

Mr. El-Murtadi said that he wished to commend the Special Rapporteur on his excellent first report on a very complex issue and his flexible and cautious approach to it.

In section III of his report, the Special Rapporteur discussed the idea of compiling an illustrative list of jus cogens rules in the light of the views expressed during debates. There was a risk, however, that some States might regard that list as comprehensive when it was not, or that it might be incomplete. On the other hand, there was nothing to prevent the Commission from clarifying the nature of jus cogens rules by providing examples in the commentary.

While there might well be many examples of cases where national and international courts had referred to jus cogens rules, in order to assuage the concerns of States which had expressed reservations about the inclusion of the topic on the Commission’s long-term programme of work, the Commission must follow its usual practice of basing its work on effective State practice.

In view of what was said in paragraph 28 of the report, it would be advisable for the Commission to focus its attention on article 53 of the Vienna Convention, the rules on jus cogens established therein and the travaux préparatoires at the 1968-1969 Vienna Conference. The positions adopted by States provided the necessary framework for determining the current nature of jus cogens. Since the Vienna Conference, they had accepted the existence of jus cogens as an exception to the general rules of international law.
None of the theories set out in paragraph 50 et seq. of the report fully explained why jus cogens was peremptory. As the decisions of courts had not sufficiently clarified that matter, he supported the Special Rapporteur’s preference for using international public law as his theoretical basis and for defining jus cogens rules as non-derogable rules embodying the fundamental values of the international community.

He was in favour of sending all three draft conclusions contained in section VII of the report to the Drafting Committee and he welcomed the flexible approach advocated by the Special Rapporteur in section VIII on future work.

Mr. Al-Marri congratulated the Special Rapporteur on his report and the promising start that he had made on the consideration of an important issue. He said that the three draft conclusions should be referred to the Drafting Committee, as they reflected broad consensus among practitioners and learned writers. The Special Rapporteur had identified the core nature of jus cogens and had proposed some practical solutions. The principle of jus cogens had been embodied in article 53 of the Vienna Convention and there was general recognition that it applied to the prohibition of genocide and aggression, as well as to the right of self-determination, inter alia.

Mr. Tladi (Special Rapporteur), summing up the debate on his first report, said that the robust and rich exchanges of views would ensure that the Commission’s work on the topic would be of the highest quality.

He had not taken any particular stance on the natural law versus positive law debate in his report. He did not agree with Mr. Valencia-Ospina’s suggestion that the adoption of article 53 of the Vienna Convention as a point of departure necessarily implied a consent-based approach. The consent/content dichotomy referred to by Mr. Petrič was most interesting. The first element, consent, raised questions about the meaning of the phrase “recognized and accepted by the international community of States as a whole” and would undoubtedly form the subject of future debates in the Commission. He was sympathetic to the view of Mr. Vázquez-Bermúdez and Mr. Caflisch that that phrase did not necessarily indicate a positivist inclination. He disagreed with Mr. Nolte and Mr. Kolodkin that article 53 necessarily resolved the debate and, like Mr. Hmoud, he did not think that it was even essential to resolve that debate. The issue of treaty-based jus cogens raised by Mr. Kamto would have to be considered in the second report. Contrary to Mr. Kamto’s opinion, resolution of the theoretical debate was not a prerequisite to addressing that question. However, he largely agreed with what Mr. Kamto had said about the approach that should be adopted to the topic.

He was open to Mr. Candioti’s idea that the title should clearly indicate that the peremptory norms of international law were jus cogens. Indeed, draft conclusion 3 (1) did that, by including the words jus cogens in parenthesis after “peremptory norms”. There ought not to be any confusion with regard to the phrases “fundamental rules”, “fundamental values” and “fundamental principles”, which were not used interchangeably. While they might be related, fundamental values were not in and of themselves rules, laws or principles. Rules, principles or laws, fundamental or otherwise, might reflect fundamental values, but that did not mean that fundamental values and fundamental laws, principles or rules were the same thing. That was the reason why draft conclusion 3 (2) said only that jus cogens protected fundamental values.

All the members of the Commission had agreed that work on the topic should rest on the material traditionally relied upon by the Commission, namely State practice, judicial decisions and the writings of scholars. Sir Michael Wood and Mr. Valencia-Ospina had questioned whether the current report remained faithful to that approach. In fact, each and every element of the draft conclusions was based on practice. He thanked Mr. Caflisch for... drawing attention to a provision of the Swiss Constitution which constituted an important example of practice and Mr. Kolodkin for his references to Russian jurisprudence.

It would be unwise for the Commission to base its work on a theoretical debate of jus cogens in order to circumvent the problem of the scarcity of practice, an issue raised by Ms. Jacobsson and Mr. Valencia-Ospina. The diversity of opinions meant that relying on theory in the absence of practice would lead to a policy-preference approach, which he had criticized elsewhere. He was grateful to Mr. Hmoud for rightly highlighting the distinction that should be made between the use of international jurisprudence as a subsidiary means of identifying rules and domestic jurisprudence which not only identified rules but also constituted practice. The use of the phrase “State and judicial practice” in the report might have obfuscated that distinction. Paragraph 10 of the report merely described the views on practice expressed in the Sixth Committee and did not imply an opinion on their correctness.

The members of the Commission had been divided on the advisability of drawing up an illustrative list. Mr. Comissário Afonso, Mr. Caflisch, Ms. Escobar Hernández, Mr. Forteau, Mr. Hmoud, Mr. Kolodkin, Mr. Niehaus, Mr. Park, Mr. Petrič, Mr. Saboia and Mr. Štúrma had been in favour of producing a list, while Mr. Kittichaisaree, Ms. Jacobsson, Mr. Murase, Mr. Nolte, Mr. Singh and Sir Michael Wood had been against it. He assured members that any list drawn up by the Commission would be based on State practice and the decisions of international courts and not on the Commission’s policy preferences. As Mr. Kolodkin had rightly said, there was a wealth of material which could be included and, as Mr. Caflisch and Mr. Comissário Afonso had indicated, such a list would be most welcome in many quarters.

Although the idea of an illustrative list might therefore sound attractive, the question of whether jus cogens was a methodological or process-oriented topic was still a matter of concern. He took Mr. Forteau’s point that what distinguished the current topic from the methodologically inclined topic of customary international law was that a normative/substantive element had been explicitly included in the syllabus approved by the Commission. That syllabus did not, however, bar the Commission from deciding to proceed in a different direction, as it had sometimes done in the past. On the other hand, Mr. Petrič might have been correct in saying that, even if the Commission decided to compile an illustrative list, it would not have to depart from a process-oriented method, provided it included only universally accepted jus cogens norms. The list to which Mr. Park had alluded had been produced not by the Commission but by the Study Group on the Fragmentation of International Law and in some respects it departed from the Commission’s own list. There seemed to be agreement within the Commission that some examples of jus cogens norms would have to be provided, at least in the commentaries. However, he took Mr. Murphy’s point that distilling a list from the commentaries for inclusion in an annex would create difficulties, because the material referred to in the commentaries had been chosen for the purposes of methodology and not because it illustrated the substance of the rules. The wisest course of action would be to follow the suggestion made by Mr. Hassouna, Mr. Kolodkin and Mr. McRae and to postpone a decision until a later stage.

Mr. McRae, Mr. Murphy and Sir Michael Wood had raised a methodological objection to what he had termed “the fluidity of the topic”, and Mr. Nolte and Mr. Singh had maintained that, once a draft conclusion had been adopted, it could no longer be treated as fluid. Mr. Hassouna had, however, rightly noted that what the report meant by a fluid approach was that proposed draft conclusions could be reconsidered, if necessary, in light of the direction chosen by the Commission. Of course, to use the language of Mr. Nolte, that would require a “positive decision”. He personally endorsed the view of Mr. Vázquez-Bermúdez that the Commission would certainly not adopt a provision of dubious correctness. Paragraph 68 of the report did not, as Mr. Murphy had asserted, declare that the conclusion that jus cogens norms were universal was provisional and subject to revision. Paragraph 67 of the report stated unequivocally that jus cogens norms were universally applicable. What was provisional was the finding that there could be no persistent objectors to jus cogens and that there was no such thing as regional jus cogens. Since no draft conclusions were proposed on regional jus cogens or persistent objectors, it was misleading to imply that paragraph 68 was an example of a fluid approach leading to the provisional adoption of draft conclusions which would have to be revisited once the Commission was confident that they were correct.

Even if future reports were to uncover a huge amount of material supporting the notion of regional jus cogens, that would not alter the basic premise that jus cogens was universally applicable. In that connection, he noted that in the topic “Identification of customary international law”, the reference in draft conclusion 16 (2) to “general practice among the States concerned” did not require the revision of draft conclusion 8, which established that “the relevant practice must be general, meaning that it must be sufficiently widespread and representative”. He therefore agreed with Mr. Nolte that the universal character of jus cogens did not exclude the possibility of regional jus cogens and with Ms. Jacobsson’s assumption that, even if the Commission were to deal with regional jus cogens, the general rule was that jus cogens applied universally. Regional jus cogens would form the subject of a detailed study in future reports; it had not been excluded, as Mr. Forteau, Mr. Hassouma, Mr. Nolte, Mr. Park and Sir Michael Wood had thought.

Contrary to the assertions of Mr. Forteau, Mr. McRae, Mr. Murphy, Mr. Nolte and Sir Michael Wood, the report did not suggest that the Commission should adopt conclusions with the intention of reconsidering them and, in any case, the Commission often reconsidered texts which it had adopted. For example, such a review had been proposed with respect to draft conclusion 4 (3) in the topic “Subsequent agreements and subsequent practice in relation to the interpretation of treaties” and with respect to draft article 1 in the topic “Immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction”.

Turning to the draft conclusions themselves, he said that draft conclusion 1 had been widely supported, subject to some comments about the text, but draft conclusion 2 had been almost universally criticized. Draft conclusion 3 (1) had been broadly supported with some suggested amendments, while a few members had criticized draft conclusion 3 (2).

With respect to the text of draft conclusion 1, to the scope of the topic as a whole and to issues of definition, Mr. Murase, supported by Ms. Escobar Hernández, had expressed puzzlement over why the report limited the scope of the topic only to the law of treaties and did not deal with the meaning and function of jus cogens in the context of the law of State responsibility. He agreed with Mr. Murase that the Commission could not ignore the implications of jus cogens in the context of State responsibility; indeed, the Commission could not ignore those implications for any area or subject of international law. The syllabus for the topic, particularly in paragraph 17, expressly included the law of State responsibility, not only as an important source of materials on which the Commission would base its work but also in relation to the effects of jus cogens on State responsibility; moreover, the materials referred to in the syllabus and his first report included materials relevant to State responsibility. As Mr. Murase had noted, the case law of the International Court of Justice and other courts on jus cogens, including that relied on in the report, overwhelmingly related to matters other than treaty law. The scope of the topic was certainly broader than just the law of treaties and would also include the law of State responsibility, particularly in relation to consequences.

Mr. Murase’s statement could be read to suggest that the definition and nature of jus cogens differed between areas of law, which was a view he did not share. The Commission had considered jus cogens in a number of contexts, including the law on State responsibility and fragmentation, and not once had such a thing ever been suggested. The implications of jus cogens differed but its nature and definition did not. It was therefore unnecessary to identify jus cogens for the purposes of treaty law and jus cogens for the purposes of the law of State responsibility.

Mr. Forteau had expressed surprise that the report did not address article 41 of the 1969 Vienna Convention, a provision which, in a way, addressed derogation. However, paragraph 4 of the report clearly indicated that issues such as the relationship between jus cogens and non-derogation would be addressed in subsequent reports. The same applied to the relationship between jus cogens and obligations erga omnes, raised by Mr. Kamto, which would be considered as part of the consequences or effects of jus cogens.

He expressed support for Mr. Nolte’s suggested amendment to draft conclusion 1, namely to replace the phrase “concern the way in which jus cogens rules are to be identified, and the legal consequences flowing from them” with “concern the identification of norms of jus cogens and their legal consequences”. Mr. Murase had made an alternative proposal; however, unless there was overwhelming support for it, he favoured it less than Mr. Nolte’s suggestion, as it implied that the topic was concerned with the existence and content of jus cogens rules, which was not the case. He agreed with Mr. McRae that it should be for the Drafting Committee to determine what draft conclusion 1 should be called, but it should base itself on any decision that the Commission might take in relation to the topics of customary international law, protection of the atmosphere and protection of the environment in relation to armed conflicts, so as to ensure a consistent approach. With regard to the French version of draft conclusion 1, he thanked Mr. Kamto for his comments and expressed the hope that the issue could be rectified.

The main thrust of the criticism of draft conclusion 2 was that its first paragraph addressed matters that fell outside the scope of the current topic, particularly by looking at how the rules of jus dispositivum could be modified, abrogated or derogated from. That concern had been raised by many members, and he had become convinced that there was merit in the criticism and that the draft conclusion strayed too far in addressing issues of a general nature that fell outside the scope of the topic. Trying to summarize such a broad area in one swift draft conclusion meant that important nuances were inevitably lost. The principal reason for proposing the draft conclusion had been to highlight the fact that international law as it currently stood recognized jus cogens as an exception to the general rule. He still believed that it was necessary to include that idea and hoped that it could be maintained, but without the current complications of the first paragraph of draft conclusion 2. Perhaps the Drafting Committee could consider incorporating it into draft conclusion 3 (1). He confessed to some uncertainty regarding Ms. Escobar Hernández’s reasoning as to why jus cogens was not exceptional. Both Mr. Hmoud and Mr. Al-Murtadi had emphasized its exceptional nature, and paragraphs 65 and 66 of the report, especially footnote 218, provided ample authority in that regard.

The comments made on draft conclusion 3 (1), which mainly concerned drafting, were very helpful. In his introductory statement, he had already proposed deleting the additional terms “modification” and “abrogation” and replacing “rules” with “norms”, both of which had met with the support of many members. He agreed with Sir Michael Wood’s suggestion, supported by Mr. Hassouna and Mr. Kittichaisaree, among others, to bring the paragraph fully into line with article 53 of the Vienna Convention.

The majority of members of the Commission had supported the substance of draft conclusion 3 (2), and some drafting suggestions had been offered. Some members had expressed doubt not about the content of the paragraph, but rather about the timing of the consideration of the paragraph. Others had expressed opposition to its content. He strongly disagreed with those who had sought to suggest that there was no support for the elements identified therein, either in general or in the report. Like a number of other members of the Commission, he considered draft conclusion 3 (2) to be very important. Virtually all members had highlighted the need for the Commission to base its work on practice, but Sir Michael Wood, supported by Mr. McRae and Mr. Forteau, had essentially suggested that the report paid lip service to that methodological approach and that there was no practice to support the elements contained in draft conclusion 3 (2).

The view that fundamental values were a core characteristic of jus cogens was so widely accepted that even a distinguished author who did not share it — Professor Kolb — had acknowledged its predominance. He was therefore surprised that some members of the Commission would wish to question it. As Mr. Petrić had correctly observed, norms that were without doubt jus cogens reflected important values, while Mr. Šturma had pointed out that peremptory norms protected the fundamental values of the international community. In its advisory opinion on Reservations to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the International Court of Justice had described the basis of the prohibition of genocide as preventing a crime “that shocks the conscience of mankind” and “which is contrary to moral law”. According to the Court, the prohibition therefore reflected “the most elementary principles of morality”. The Court’s statement confirmed that the prohibition of genocide, which it had subsequently confirmed several times as a norm of jus cogens, reflected fundamental human values. It had been restated several times with approval by the Court, particularly in decisions confirming the jus cogens nature of that prohibition, and by a number of other tribunals, including the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.

In response to Mr. Murphy’s statement that the Court had never referred to “fundamental values”, he referred the Commission to the authorities cited in footnote 238 of the report, including the 2007 and 2015 judgments in, respectively, Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro) and Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Croatia v. Serbia), in which the Court had described norms of jus cogens as those protecting “essential humanitarian values”. It was therefore not true to say that the inclusion of fundamental values in the draft conclusion was based on unsubstantiated extrapolations from the Vienna Convention. In Prosecutor v. Anto Furundžija, ICTY had been more explicit in linking the status of the prohibition of torture as a jus cogens norm to “the importance of the values it protects”. It had stated: “Clearly, the jus cogens nature of the prohibition against torture articulates the notion that the prohibition has now become one of the most fundamental standards of the international community.” Its words had been quoted in several jurisdictions, including by the European Court of Human Rights in Al-Adsani v. the United Kingdom. In Michael Domingues v. United States, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights had stated that norms of jus cogens derived their status from fundamental values held by the international community. The cases cited were all mentioned in the report; moreover, the Commission had approved the persistent objector requirement essentially on the strength of two obiter dicta in the Fisheries and Asylum cases, far less than what was referred to in the present instance.

Many statements had been made by States expressing the view that jus cogens norms protected the fundamental values of the international community. In addition to those of Lebanon and Nigeria, referred to in the report, there were countless others, particularly in relation to the Commission’s work on the law of treaties. During the twenty-fifth session of the United Nations General Assembly, under the agenda item on the review of the role of the International Court of Justice, Belgium had noted that the prohibition of the use of force in Article 2 (4) of the Charter was so fundamental that it had become a peremptory norm of international law. At the twenty-seventh session, under an item on the review of the Charter, Spain had noted that voting procedures, important though they were, could in no way be equated with fundamental principles, asserting that, while they were part of positive law, they were not peremptory and were therefore not untouchable. During the thirty-first session, commenting on the draft articles on State responsibility, Yugoslavia had described jus cogens norms as obligations that were essential for the protection of fundamental interests of the international community, and Mali had described them as those that served the fundamental interests of mankind. Greece, during the forty-ninth session, had considered the prosecution of international crimes, which it had said were prohibited by jus cogens, to be for the protection of fundamental interests of humanity.

The statement of France to the fifty-first session of the General Assembly, on the Commission’s work on State responsibility, was particularly important given that, at that stage, France had yet to recognize jus cogens. Expressing doubt about what had then been draft article 19 of the articles on State responsibility, France had noted that the concept of an international obligation so essential for the protection of fundamental interests of the international community seemed roughly to correspond to the concept of a peremptory norm of general international law. While it denied the existence, at that time, of jus cogens, it had clearly linked jus cogens to fundamental interests of the international community. The idea that jus cogens norms reflected fundamental interests had similarly been advanced by South Africa during the fifty-fifth session, while Germany had referred to fundamental humanitarian values and Costa Rica, represented by Mr. Niehaus, had referred to fundamental interests. At the fifty-sixth session, Portugal had said that:

“...The concepts of jus cogens, obligations erga omnes and international crimes of State or serious breaches of obligations under peremptory norms of general international law were based on a common belief in certain fundamental values of international law which, because of their importance to the international community as a whole, deserved to be better protected than others.”

Similarly, in its application in Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Belgium, with Sir Michael Wood as its counsel, had observed that the prohibition of torture was jus cogens because of, inter alia, the importance that the international community as a whole attached to the suppression of torture.

Domestic jurisprudence advancing the same idea was similarly plentiful. In the United Kingdom, the court in R v. Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs had stated that the prohibition of torture was a jus cogens norm because of the importance of the values it protected. Similarly, the United States Court of Appeals, in Siderman de Blake v. Argentina, had stated that jus cogens norms were derived from values taken to be fundamental by the international community. One possibility that the Drafting Committee might consider was to refer to “fundamental interests”, although he retained a preference for “values”. Another drafting suggestion, for which he expressed some support, had come from Ms. Jacobsson, who had suggested replacing “protect” with “reflect”.

Many members had agreed that jus cogens norms were superior to the other rules of international law, but a few members had expressed doubt about the reference to hierarchy. Those doubts seemed to stem from two sources: first, that there was no material support for the inclusion of hierarchy; and secondly, the view that hierarchical superiority, to the extent that jus cogens norms had such a quality, was a consequence and should be addressed in that context. He disagreed with both criticisms. The first was particularly curious as the Commission had previously expressly endorsed the hierarchical superiority of jus cogens. In paragraph 70 and footnote 232, the report referred to conclusion 32 of the work of the Study Group on the Fragmentation of International Law, which had recognized that jus cogens was an example of a rule of international law that was “superior to other rules on account of the importance of its content as well as the universal acceptance of its superiority”.

GE.16-12542
The idea of hierarchical superiority was supported in domestic and international jurisprudence. The United States Court of Appeals, in Committee of United States Citizens Living in Nicaragua v. Reagan, had referred to jus cogens norms as those that enjoyed the highest status in international law, and that had been reiterated in several other Court of Appeals decisions. Many individual opinions in United States Court of Appeals decisions cited United States Citizens Living in Nicaragua favourably. Other United States Court of Appeals decisions supporting that conclusion included Sarei v. Rio Tinto, PLC, which had described jus cogens norms as those deserving of the highest status under international law. The same line of reasoning could also be discerned in United States district court rulings: for example, in Mani Kumari Sabbithi, et al., v. Major Waleed KH N.S. Al Saleh, et al., the United States District Court for the District of Columbia had defined jus cogens norms as those which enjoyed the highest status in international law and which prevailed over both customary international law and treaties.

The notion of jus cogens being hierarchically superior could also be seen in a number of United Kingdom judgments, including the various opinions in the Pinochet case. Lord Wilkinson, for example, had stated that jus cogens enjoyed a higher rank in the international hierarchy than treaty law and even “ordinary” customary international law. Lord Bingham, in A and others v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, had adopted a similar approach, which had subsequently been followed in several other decisions of the House of Lords. The notion of hierarchical superiority had been supported in many decisions of the Canadian courts, such as the Supreme Court’s ruling in Kazemi Estate v. Islamic Republic of Iran that jus cogens norms were a higher form of customary international law, and in those of the domestic courts of Argentina. In Mazzeo, Julio Lilo et al., the Supreme Court of Argentina had recognized jus cogens as the highest source of international law. Similarly, in the Simón, Julio Héctor et al. case, the Supreme Court had stated that jus cogens norms were above not only treaty law, but all international law. Practice, in the form of domestic court decisions recognizing hierarchical superiority, was also available from the Philippines, such as Bayan Muna v. Alberto Romulo, and Zimbabwe, such as Mann v. Equatorial Guinea.

Regional courts had also referred to the hierarchical superiority of jus cogens courts. The European Court of Human Rights, in Al-Dulimi and Montana Management Inc. v. Switzerland, had referred to the peremptory effect of the higher-ranking norm of jus cogens. In the inter-American system, Michael Domingues v. United States had referred to jus cogens as “higher order legal norms”.

The hierarchically superior character of jus cogens was virtually unchallenged, except, it seemed, by some members of the Commission. Portugal, during the fifty-sixth session of the General Assembly, had noted that jus cogens focused on the idea of a material hierarchy of norms, the superior norms being non-derogable. At the sixty-eighth session, the Netherlands had stated that jus cogens was hierarchically superior within the international law system, irrespective of whether it took the form of written law or customary law. Other statements recognizing the hierarchical superiority of jus cogens included those of Cuba during the twenty-second session, Greece during the thirty-fifth session and Slovakia and Cyprus during the fifty-fourth session. In its pleadings before the International Court of Justice in Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece intervening), Germany had noted that the notion of hierarchical superiority flowing from jus cogens was a product of post-Second World War international law.

With respect to the second criticism, namely that hierarchical superiority was more a consequence than a characteristic of jus cogens, it was not clear why that should be the case, nor why, as suggested by Mr. Murase and others, that hierarchical superiority applied only with respect to treaty law. In the conclusions of the work of the Study Group, the Commission had not limited the description of jus cogens as hierarchically superior to its application in the context of treaty law, nor had it suggested that it was a consequence. Moreover, the cases and statements by States previously cited referred in the main to hierarchical superiority in the context of State responsibility.

In his view, one of the consequences of hierarchical superiority was invalidity, but hierarchical superiority itself was not a consequence, as could also be seen from the Commission’s conclusions on the work of the Study Group. Conclusions 32 and 33 described jus cogens in terms of, inter alia, superiority, while conclusion 41 set out effects, including invalidity. The Commission had not seen hierarchical superiority solely as a consequence.

He was surprised by the claim made by some that there was no support for the universal application of jus cogens, recalling that he had already referred to the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on Reservations to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, which described genocide, a norm it later confirmed as jus cogens, as one having a universal character. The notion of universal application had been affirmed in decisions of other courts, both international and domestic. The United States Court of Appeals, in Siderman, had stated that, while customary international law derived solely from the consent of States, the “fundamental and universal norms constituting jus cogens” were different, while in Smith v. Libya the Court had said that jus cogens norms were universally binding by their very nature. The Federal Court of Australia had referred to jus cogens in terms of universality in Nulyarimma v. Thompson.

As noted by Mr. Vázquez-Bermúdez, the Inter-American Court had, in an advisory opinion, noted that the fundamental principle of equality, which it had deemed jus cogens, was applicable to all States. States, too, had routinely referred to the universal character of jus cogens in deliberations of the General Assembly. Moreover, in Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda), the Democratic Republic of the Congo had referred to jus cogens as being imposed on all States independent of their acceptance. Belgium, in its application in Belgium v. Senegal, had stated that jus cogens was “a body of legal rules applicable to all States”. In its application in Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro), Bosnia had stated that jus cogens norms were “binding on all States of the World Community”. As noted in the report, the United States, in its counter-memorial in Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), had also pointed to the prohibition on the use of force as having jus cogens status, inter alia owing to the fact that it was a “universal norm”. In addition, there were countless individual opinions of judges and many references in the literature, as reflected in the report. Those elements were ubiquitous in practice, and it would be strange and disconcerting if the Commission were to cast doubt on them.

In the light of comments made and the changes he intended to propose to draft conclusion 3 (1), he would be happy to change the title of draft conclusion 3 to refer to the definition of jus cogens norms, rather than their general nature. He recommended that draft conclusion 1 should be referred to the Drafting Committee, where no doubt some improvements could be made. He would not propose referral of draft conclusion 2 to the Committee. With regard to draft conclusion 3, he recommended its referral to the Drafting Committee on the understanding that amendments, in particular those seeking that paragraph 1 should more closely follow the Vienna Convention, should be considered by the Commission.

Finally, although he did not agree with the criticism directed at his fluid approach, he was willing to adopt the approach that the Commission had followed in its work on the topic of customary international law, namely that draft conclusions referred to the Drafting Committee should remain in the Drafting Committee until it had finalized a full set of draft conclusions. The Commission could, of course, continue to be appraised of the work of the Commission through interim reports when necessary.

Many members of the Commission had commented on the title of the topic: Mr. Murase, Mr. Kamto, Mr. Hassouna and several others had suggested that it should be changed to “Jus cogens in international law”. He agreed that, without the qualifier, the title might suggest that the Commission was considering jus cogens in its entirety, including jus cogens under domestic law. As not all members had expressed their view on the subject, he intended to make a specific proposal in that regard in his next report so that the Commission could take a decision.

Mr. Forteau said that it would be very helpful if the Special Rapporteur could provide the Drafting Committee with a list of the practice and jurisprudence cited in his summing up, much of which did not appear in the first report.

The Chairman said that he took it that the Commission wished to refer draft conclusions 1 and 3 to the Drafting Committee, taking into account the recommendations made by the Special Rapporteur and leaving open the question of how to proceed further.

It was so decided.

The Chairman said that the Drafting Committee on the topic of “Jus cogens” would meet that afternoon.

Mr. Murase, expressing surprise that the composition of the Drafting Committee on the topic had been discussed the previous day before the Commission had decided whether to refer any text to it, said that he wished to be included among its members.

The Chairman invited him and any other interested members to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Drafting Committee.

Mr. Singh said that he would also like to join the Drafting Committee.

The meeting rose at 12.55 p.m.
